Excerpt: .letter to Hawkins, made sure that it was accurately and fully addressed, and then bundled all the letters back again. In doing so her eye caught sight of something which made her stop singing, and hastily snatch up one of the envelopes. It was the one which not an hour since she had watched Mrs. Cosmo Fox fasten down and address. In the meantime the direction had been altered. The words Dunmere Castle, Frithshire, N.B., had been erased, and Claridge s Hotel, London, substituted in Mademoiselle Ixe s small, foreign, and unmistakable handwriting. IV. HE rain which had been threatening for some days finally descended upon Sunday, and by pouring steadily from morn till eve, completed the gloomy character of that sacred day, as observed under Mrs. Merrington s roof. Not only, according to her system, was attendance at two public and two private...
