Just before the play began, the Culver cadets, who were in Washington in a body, marched into the theater and occupied a dozen rows of seats which had been reserved for them in front. Their behavior was so conspicuously considerate of the rights of others, their appearance so winsome and fine, and their courtesy so genuine, that I have ever since had a strong feeling that whatever might be true of military training for boys in some places, that given at Culver must be based upon a real understanding of the process by which boy-material is fashioned into manhood. Now I have been permitted to read the proof sheets of this book by Colonel L. R. Gignilliat on Arms and the Boy, and to say a word to introduce it to its readers. Of all callings, it has sometimes seemed to me that that of the headmaster of a secondary school for boys is at once the most responsible and the most delightful; delightful because he comes in contact there with the spirit of youth as it is beginning to measure itself against the task of life, and responsible because the problem is so subtle, requires so much understanding of personal variation and difference, and also because of the fact that a mistake made with a...
