Excerpt: . . . 11 with implications for ALS and many other diseases. The blood-brain barrier (and blood-spinal cord barrier) normally exclude many potentially helpful drugs. Surgical access to the brain is itself not a trivial matter, even with the dramatic advances in brain imaging to guide surgeons, and better methods for physically introducing therapeutics to specific regions of the brain are needed. Likewise, the ongoing efforts to develop drugs that target free radical damage, excitotoxicity, and apoptosis may have a broad range of applications. Just as common mechanisms of damage in many neurological disorders provide synergies for progress, the shared obstacles to therapy for many diseases can also have a positive effect as insights gleaned from each may apply to others. Although investigator initiated research proposals are at the heart of NIH strategy, we actively stimulate research in particular disorders when emerging scientific opportunities or public impact of a disease warrant such intervention. On both counts we certainly believe ALS merits special attention. The NINDS extramural program has been reorganized with creation of a Neurodegeneration Cluster that reflects the common themes driving neurodegeneration research. We are working to enhance research on ALS in a number of ways, including grant solicitations, work-shops, and informal discussions with the research community, and are working closely with ALS advocacy groups in many of these efforts.
